Caregiving

The area of caregiving is one of Dr. Keefe's primary research focuses, encompassing various research topics. In conjunction with other investigators, Dr. Keefe has been conducting research in this field for over 20 years.

Caregiver Assessment:

Dr. Keefe has dedicated more than 10 years of her career to the development and implementation of family caregiver assessment, with the development of The C.A.R.E. Tool. In the most recent project, the research team examined whether the timing of caregiver assessment makes a difference to persons who are caring for a partner with cognitive impairment

Double Duty Caregiving:

Dr. Keefe has worked with a team of researchers from Western University (lead by Catherine Ward Griffin) examining issues of double duty caregiving for nearly 10 years. The research team have examined the effects of maintaining a professional career in caring while providing unpaid care for family or friends. This research also looked at negotiating the boundaries between professional and familial care.

Other Caregiving Research:

Dr. Keefe has been involved in various caregiving-focused projects throughout her career. In the past 10 years, her collaborative work has focused on the economic and social contributions of caregivers, supportive social policy, and retirement issues related to caregiving.

Continuing Care

Since 2009, Dr. Keefe has led the development of a research team to investigate issues of resident quality of life in the continuing care system. It is hoped that this team will continue to collaborate beyond the 2014 conclusion of Care and Construction.

Nursing Home Quality of Life: Over the past 2 years, Dr. Keefe, Dr. Kevin Kelloway and Ann McInnis have led a research project examining the models of care in Nova Scotia nursing homes, and assessing their impact on resident's quality of life. The development of the 23 member multidisciplinary, multi-sectorial research team and successful research proposal was supported by a grant from the Nova Scotia Health Research Foundation.

Health Human Resources

During her time as CRC, Dr. Keefe led two main streams of research related to continuing care. The first, which has led to more than 10 years of work with the same research team, focused on projecting the human resource supply and demand (paid and unpaid) required to care for an aging population. Earlier work assessed the impact of cognitive impairment on the use of formal and informal networks by older Canadians, followed by planning for Canadian human resource needs in chronic homecare for seniors in 2031. The work of the team evolved to highlight the experiences of the baby boomers, examining caregiver supply and demand and public and private spending in home care services.

The second stream of research examined human resource strategies that would be required to attract and retain home care paraprofessionals. Consultations were held in five provinces across Canada with key stakeholders in home care.

Home Support Workers:

This two phase research program examined issues related to the recruitment and retention of paraprofessional care workers to meet the needs of an aging population. Feedback was garnered from hundreds of stakeholders, during consultations in five provinces.

Projecting Need:

Earlier projects in projecting needs focused on assessing the impact of cognitive impairment on the use of formal and informal networks by elderly Canadians and planning for Canadian human resource needs in chronic homecare for the elderly in 2031. Dr. Keefe’s research evolved to include research about caregiver supply and demand and public and private spending in home care services.

Other Collaborative Research

Age-Friendly Environments:

Dr. Keefe began work with the Age-Friendly initiative in 2006. A large portion of Nova Scotia’s seniors live in rural and remote areas so the imperative exists to understand how more supportive environments can be developed and maintained for an aging population. This body of research has resulted in numerous reports, including a practical guide to stimulate advocacy, community development and policy change to make rural communities in Nova Scotia more age-friendly.

Seniors’ Housing:

Dr. Keefe worked in collaboration with a large team of Atlantic Canadian researchers to examine the housing and support needs, both existing and emerging, of an aging population. In 2010-2011, the team developed a report highlighting policy recommendations on how these housing needs could be better met in the future.

Canadian Dementia Knowledge Translation Network (CDKTN):

The CDKTN is a national network for knowledge translation (KT) and exchange (KE) of research in Alzheimer's disease and dementia. Dr. Keefe continues to lead the Knowledge Translation for Policy Development branch of the network.
