Scholarly and Professional Activity

My primary interest is the psychology of policing and my research can be more broadly conceptualized as applied social research at the interface of social and clinical psychology. My research has focused on police culture, police-community (especially race) relations, and workplace violence and stress. Other areas of interest include intergroup relations, prejudice, discrimination, and coping with chronic disease. I recently completed a study investigating the motivational bases that drive volunteer firefighters and I am currently a partner on a sexual health research project involving universities across the Maritimes. I am looking forward to more criminal justice-related research and a study year abroad at the Royal Melbourne Institute of Technology.

Between 1998 and 2010 I primarily focused on international development work. I taught the first psychology course ever offered, and was the CIDA evaluator for a peer health education project in The Gambia. Between 2000 and 2004 I worked as a consultant to the Philippine National Police on a five year CIDA-funded project designed to ameliorate the abuses suffered by sex-trade workers in that country. Finally, in 2010 I completed a six-year term as the project director of the $1,000,000 CIDA funded, AUCC managed, Community-Based Policing in The Gambia project.

I also have spent considerable time consulting to the Halifax Regional Police Force, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and the Department of Community Services, Province of Nova Scotia. Finally, I have served as a lecturer for the Canadian Police College's Advanced Leadership course.
